Contenu

Most studies of migration and citizenship in the social sciences exhibit a short memory, and to the extent that they are historically informed, they make only passing reference to radically different contexts to see what is "new" at the turn of the twenty-first century. The lack of historical awareness in the public debate has reinforced the idea that we are living in "exceptional" times, in a perpetual state of "crisis" that is incommensurable with the past and therefore require "new" frames of understanding. Bringing together historians and social scientist, this interdisciplinary course will challenge this view. Focusing on the transformations of the concept and practice and citizenship across times and contexts, it will show that the palette of state responses to human mobility remains somewhat limited, and can be explained through careful case selection and periodisation. The course is open to all MA students in History and in the Social Sciences. History students will gain awareness of the continued relevance of their research into the present. Social science students will be offered the tools to historicise their own research. All participants will gain insights into the merits and pitfalls of historical-comparative approaches to migration-related issues, and mutually benefit from an interdisciplinary dialogue.
