Contenu

This course is organized by the EuMIGS network. It consists of 8 lectures and 4 seminars that explore multiscalar refugee reception across Europe. Refugee reception means to follow both international and supranational laws and conventions to guarantee equal standards of granting asylum. But efforts have to go further to ensure fruitful measures in terms of housing, health care, education and employment, as well as to provide guidance for asylum, detention and attention to vulnerable groups such as unaccompanied minors and victims of torture. All these standards have to be equally applied to all refugees regardless of their country of origin or religious affiliation.

Contrary to those common rules we could observe over the last years in a cross-country comparison across Europe that refugee reception is largely shaped by national and local migration governance. By focusing on refugee reception in different national contexts in Europe, the course enables students to explore differences and similarities in refugee reception across Europe, to learn how different welfare and citizenship regimes affect migration policy and to develop a comparative view on migration policies across Europe.

Forme de l'évaluation

Mandatory and active participation in lecture and seminars, final written paper

Documentation

The texts that students need to read before the seminars will be uploaded on Moodle.

Pré-requis

Open to all students of the Master in social sciences, pilier migration et citoyenneté

Forme de l'enseignement

The course consists of 8 online lectures (2 speakers from 2 different universities per session) and 4 online seminars. During the seminars, students work in break-out rooms and discuss the lectures and readings in small groups composed of students of three different universities. The course will take place entirely in English. Students are asked to participate actively during the discussions of the lectures and during the seminars. The seminars will be based on texts that students need to read in advance and that are connected to the themes of the lectures.
