Contenu

In this seminar, we will explore the intricate connection between stone, bones and the human in medieval texts. In both classical and biblical traditions, the first humans are thought to have been formed from stone, an idea that medieval authors take up and elaborate on. At the other end of the life spectrum, the bones of deceased saints (composed of "stony" minerals) are said to move on their own as well as to move others, while the skeletons of ordinary people are able to speak to the living from beyond the grave. Some stones possess the power to travel of their own accord, or they can be moved only by magic, as when Merlin builds Stonehenge. Gemstones in turn are able to change humans as they are thought to be imbued with magical and medicinal qualities. Thus, the boundaries between the inanimate and the animate are far less clear-cut than they may appear, raising the timeless question about where life begins and where it ends.
